Abstract
Eugene O'Neill's The Emperor Jones (1920) presents the dilemma of a man who is torn between two different worlds. The first world is the one which represents his present as an emperor, the second world is the one which represents his racial and personal history as an African-American man who has a notorious past as an ex-convict who run away from prison by killing the prison guard. Jones adopts the principles and the values of the American colonialism which leads him to persecute the natives and to exploit them. In scene 1, Jones is presented as a proud and self-confident emperor. He is aware of his superiority not only over the natives but over Smithers, the white trader. But gradually Jones's inner conflict float on the surface when Smithers tells him of a rebellion which is organized against him by the natives in the hills under the leadership of Lem. This rebellion arouses his fear which increases when he hears the sound of the drums which continues throughout the play with an increasing speed and volume. Jones decides to run away to the forest and then he will take a ship which will take him out of the island.
Jones's journey in the forest is ,in fact, symbolic of an internal journey in his min. The characters whom he meets in the forest, such as Jef and the prison guard, are images in his own mind. Jones's confrontation with these characters is a confrontation with his past. This confrontation reveals hidden sides in Jones's personality. As Jones goes deeper in the forest, his fears heighten increasingly. These increasing fears are intensified with the increasing sounds of the drums. Jones's fears do not come as a result of his losing his way in the forest only but they come as a result of his psychological disorientation. He is confronted with fearful apparitions which exist within his psyche and he refers to them as Little formless fears," which, later, take more concrete shapes.
Jones does not identify himself with the natives of the island, though he shares with them the same racial past
