The concept of development

Development anthropology refers to the application of anthropological perspective to the multidisciplinary branch of development studies. It takes international development and international aid as primary objects. In this branch of anthropology, the term development refers to the social action made by different agents (e.g. institutions, businesses, states, or independent volunteers) who are trying to modify the economic, technical, political, and social life of a given place in the world, especially in impoverished, formerly colonized regions. Development is the ascension of the society and moving it from a steady state to a higher and better situation, and the good it reaches to exploit the existing, existing and potential energies and employ them for the better. Development is a rapid, cumulative and lasting increase over a period of time in production and services as a result of the use of scientific efforts to organize joint governmental and popular activities.

Forms of development
